The Mapuche Human Rights Situation

The Mapuche people is a pre-Columbian nation that has traditionally lived in the south of the area now occupied by the states of Chile and Argentina. It was the only indigenous people in South America to achieve political independence from Spain, exercising its territorial sovereignty and self-determination before the declaration of independence, in 1810, of those states.

The autonomy of Spain was granted by the Treaty of Killin -1641- this treaty was subsequently ratified by Spain in thirty treaties, including Chile-after independence. Argentina also recognized the border with the Mapuche Nation fortifying throughout its territory.

The Mapuche people have been fighting for the return of their ancestral territory since being occupied by both republics. Under the current government of Bachelet, particularly with Jorge Burgos as Minister of Interior, it has increased repression, stigmatization, discrimination and criminalization against the Mapuche, particularly against those communities that support territorial political, economic, cultural and autonomy and self-determination claims,. With significantly increased military arms purchasing and police officers presence in Mapuche area's as well as a repeated rhetoric criminalizing Mapuche government officials and the discretionary use of the Patriot Act. The government's refusal to enter into any constructive dialogue with Mapuche leaders serves only to compound this problem.

Chile prohibits CONADI (National Indigenous Development Corporation) to acquire land for communities that are actively fighting for the return of what historically belongs to them, fragmenting and stigmatizing these communities in an attempt to divide between "violent" and "peaceful". The emphasis of the government has been the criminalization and militarization of the area as a form of social control. The police, with full support from the government, enjoys impunity for the violation of fundamental human rights. The government ignores repeated national and international calls to address the conflict as a political problem.

Mapuche territorial claim and HLFFDP .

Successive democratic governments have concentrated their efforts on the extension for 20 years of DL 701 on Forest Development, implemented by the military dictatorship in 1974, and a tax payment of 55 million dollars. However, the results of evaluations of this policy conclude that 69.8% of the subsidies provided by the decree have favored large and medium sized forest enterprises, particularly the Angelini and Matte group, which control 80% of exports forest country.

The increase of monoculture eucalyptus and pine, to the detriment of native forests and agricultural land, in addition to destroying ecosystems and damage to the environment, has compromised the food security of future generations. High water consumption of monocultures have affected the water balance of the territories, causing shortage of drinking water and generate unemployment, poverty and rural migration to urban centers.

The territorial domain of large forestry companies in the territory of the Mapuche people has intensified the conflict. To safeguard the interests of these companies, the last two governments have invested a considerable sum of money to equip police groups -GOPE (Police Special Operations Group) and DIPOLCAR (Directorate of Police Intelligence of Carabineros) - which are responsible for repressing particularly those communities that are in the process of territorial claim.

Development projects and infrastructure in Mapuche territory.

The construction of high-speed roads to facilitate the transport of forestry companies and landowners have been opposed by Mapuche communities affected. Convention 169 establishes free and informed, prior consent, which is routinely violated by the authorities. The Juan Paillalef community of Cunco is a prime example. The cultural and spiritual heritage of the Mapuche is continually ignored, as in Oak-Carimallín, community of Río Bueno, in which the Ceremonial Center Kintuante tis located, is threatened to be flooded by the construction of the hydroelectric plant Osorno, the Pilmaiken Company SA, whose environmental impact study was approved without participation of affected communities.
